

04/27/09 - Now Appearing In Austin, Texas

Hello there! If you are new here, you might want to subscribe to the RSS feed for updates on this topic. This blog has gone dark over the last two or so weeks, but for a very good reason. On the 21st of April, I flew from Perth, Western Australia to Austin, Texas, where I will be staying for the next 6 months. For those not acquainted with the trip, it's half a world away at over 13,000km, for a total flying time of 29 hours not including layovers (for my trip, anyway). I've been spending the last week settling down here in Austin, and the week before that preparing for the trip. I'm still suffering from some jet lag, and catching up on the last 8 months with my girlfriend, who I hadn't seen since August 2008. I haven't had the time nor the concentration required to write a blog post, and I haven't touched my Google Reader account, which I can see has over 1,600 unread articles.

However, I do have some interesting posts coming up. I'm planning a response to an AI article that was linked to me in a comment, a more in depth look at the importance of searching by solving the 8-Queens problems in Python using some different search techniques, and a look at creating some graceful degradation control adapters for ASP.NET server controls that don't work without Javascript.

So, don't unsubscribe from my feed in your readers, the blog isn't abandoned, life has just taken priority over it. When things settle down, I'll start writing articles again.